* TO BE CHARMING — NOT BEAUTIFUL — OUGHT TO *
* BE WOMAN'S GOAL. *

TWO VIEWS OF MARGARET ILLINGTON'S FACE, SHOWING HOW IT IS CHARM, RATHER THAN BEAUTY, WHICH MAKES HER LOVELY.

BY MARGARET ILLINGTON.

Whenever you pick up a newspaper nowadays and turn to the woman's page you are very apt to get an idea that every woman is seeking physical beauty and nothing else.

So many pretty actresses in the country are telling all the other women the means by which they were made beautiful, the means by which they stay beautiful and the means by which they hope to keep their beauty until death does them part.

Sometimes I think that men are more interested in these "beauty chaps" than are the women, for the editors are so anxious to print all this beauty talk. My women friends tell me THEY do not have time to read it, as WOMEN who have some work of the world to do cannot selfishly spend long hours daily in making themselves beautiful to the eye alone.

Least of all, I am sure, does the actress have time or inclination to be trying always to improve her pulchritude.

Few successful actresses have been beauties, but they have all been women of great force of character and splendid health.

But it makes no difference if the successful actress never had a pimple on her nose in her life. You can't love and admire you so much that they will consider the flesh, the freckle and the cast among your greatest attractions.

Here is the truth—actresses have no open sesame to the vaults where beauty is stored. They are much like other women and they often do things in regard to their health which they ought not to do and do not do things which they ought to do.

Clever actresses, like other clever women, find out what kind of food, exercise and how much sleep, work and play is good for them and then plan their daily regime upon this.

Actresses, however, know no more about making themselves beautiful than any other class of women. Neither are they naturally more beautiful.

Personally, I do not think that physical beauty is as much to be desired as many other things. Beauty is the most ephemeral of all the qualities that enhance the charm of femininity and I think if most women would avoid the silly trying to make themselves over into something they are not and strive to become interesting, they would retain popularity longer.

And isn't popularity, after all, the thing we really want?

If you make yourself interesting you can snap your fingers at beauty blemishes and make those about you love and admire you so much that they will consider the flesh, the freckle and the cast among your greatest attractions.

ARE YOUR GUESTS INCONSIDERATE?

Many Summer Entertainers Find Thoughtless Friends Are Real Burdens When Visiting—"Never Again," Say Hostesses.

BY ADA PATTERSON.

Summer vacation visits are over and the stage of talking about them has begun. Upon the conclusions formed in the last stage depends whether the crop of invitations for next summer will be large or small. Also whether we will receive many or few for the winter holidays.

A visit isn't of the same family of events as a stay at a hotel, though many persons so regard it. Those so regarding it are the guests, not the host or hostess, as some of these conversational aftermaths of summer visits prove.

Last summer at a house party in one of the hospitable country homes half way between New York and Boston, I heard a frank man and a candid woman congratulate each other that this time they were the entertained instead of entertainers. Said the woman: "I'm going to sell my place on Long Island. I've been driven out of it by my thoughtless friends. I think I have the most inconsiderate circle of friends that ever camped on a woman. I invite them to my cottage for a week-end, expecting them to arrive with a dress suit case or a telescope bag to hold a change of linen and perhaps evening clothes, but every one of them brings a trunk. That means the cost of paying an expressman and a long delay before dinner, for trunks always take their own time to arrive. But this is what made me make up my mind to move."

"A man friend came out for the Sunday. I don't keep a horse, nor yet an automobile. If my friends want the air they have to do as I do—walk. My man guest didn't relish the idea of walking. Twice I suggested it and twice he postponed the pleasure. At last he said: 'Wouldn't you like to take a drive?' I thanked him and said I would. He asked me to direct him to the livery stable and he came back in a gay little cart with a high stepper. I enjoyed the drive very much, and the memory of it, until I got the bill from the livery stable. He had charged the horse and carriage hire to me."

"Strange he walked to the stable," said the man who was having a vacation from entertaining. "My guests telephone everywhere. It seems to me they visit me to telephone long distance messages. Not one of them ever offers to pay the toll."

A popular hostess complained that her guests were lazy about rising. They inconvenienced her and each other because the bathtub in this country house, being the only one, must be used in rotation. "I shall never invite one of them again," she said. "If they have millionaire friends who have a bathroom for each bedroom they go there and get up at any hour they choose. Or if there are none of these wealthy friends they may go to a hotel and pay for their accommodations, if they can."

"Never Again" for Her.

Another hostess noted for her hospitality said, as she flowed out of the Grand Central station in New York with the rest of the stream of returning humanity:

"I'm all tired out. I've never given an invitation in my life that wasn't accepted."

Unpleasant aftermaths of a pleasant summer, these criticisms, and they're a moral to past and prospective guests. Remember that you are not at a hotel. You are not paying for your large room with the field scented breeze billowing the curtains, your fresh country food, and your naps on the piazzas or long spins on country roads. You pay for them only approximately and that in the coin of consideration.

Consideration is Appreciated.

Consideration involves a hearty appreciation of what is offered you, and an exact conforming to the routine of the house. If the family rises at five, and it is your habit to rise at nine, you must leave your wooling sheets at five. If the family dines at twelve and you are accustomed to dining at seven you must eat your midday dinner with a smiling face even though with a protesting stomach. If you don't wish to do this there is an easy alternative. Decline the next invitation. Their disappointment may not be as overwhelming as you fancy, and that brings me to the second moral for guests. Don't think that you are always wanted when you are asked. The tired hostess grumbling her way out of the Grand Central station is not an uncommon type. She is a sister of the woman who gives Christmas presents because she "has to," a wicked desecration of a beautiful day and perversion of a tender custom.

And for the hostess, she has command of the situation. The moral for her is, Be not inconsiderate. If you don't want to entertain a guest don't invite him. Unwelcome bread is as bitter as a grudging holiday gift is undesired. Don't fill your house with people, and then complain that you are keeping a hotel. They wouldn't be there if you hadn't asked them. Don't speak a word that makes parasites of them—and a hypocrite of you.
